well as a container for gracious living. The six-story, red brick building, built in 1914, displays a last, exuberant, chest-beating gasp of architectural classicism before many top-drawer American buildings were given a more stylized or streamlined treatment during the 1920s and '30s. It was designed by Charles M. Robinson, one of Richmond's most prolific architects. He also created such beloved icons as the Landmark Theater, Miller & Rhoads department store and Thomas Jefferson High School.

At Stuart Circle, Robinson delivered a fully-loaded classical façade. There is a rusticated, sandstone treatment on the public street level. On the fifth floor the windows are incorporated in the entablature and immediately above this is a fully-articulated cornice supported with hardy, mannerist, paired brackets. An attic level tops this off.

The structure celebrates its site by curving to follow the sweep of Lombardy as it melds into West Franklin. This arc is a highly urbane architectural tour de force and makes One Monument Avenue perhaps the only building in Richmond whose form follows so faithfully and tightly the arc of the street it faces.

Both the main entrance and a secondary lobby are announced by spectacular iron and glass marquees that shelter front steps.

But while hardly obsequious, the building joins First English Evangelical Lutheran Church (also designed by Charles M. Robinson), the Stuart Court Apartments and St. John's United Church of Christ as a handsome setting for the J.E.B. Stuart statue and its surrounding traffic circle.

To the passerby there are few hints of the changes that have taken place here. Preservation tax credits were part of the $13 million financing package so the historic fabric went largely untouched.

But step inside, and people looking for the old Stuart Circle will find little to remind them of its institutional past. This is a good thing because Stuart Circle, like most hospitals, was marked by a long, narrow hallways with a seemingly endless succession of doors. Commonwealth Architects and the project's developer, One Monument Avenue L.P., eliminated the building's block-long, arclike hallways. Where rooms used to line up like birds on a power line, walls have been removed to eliminate the endless hallway. The building has been reconfigured so that many of the apartments have rooms stretching across the structure with windows on both the eastern and western walls.

Interesting architecture is more than just well-articulated space fashioned from solids, voids and the play of light. Evocative buildings are also elaborate, complex and sometimes confusing vessels that contain collective history and personal memories. Homes, schools and even hospitals can be such places.

Consider the former Stuart Circle Hospital at Lombardy and West Franklin streets, where Monument Avenue turns into West Franklin. Until recently this was a residential-scaled hospital and an inextricable part of the immediate neighborhood and wider community because of its crossroads location and the care it provided thousands of Richmonders for most of the 20th century. I have friends who were born there, family who used its emergency room and an ancient grandmother who died there one Sunday night as I stood by her bed.

When the hospital was closed recently, there was disquietude, especially among residents of the Fan and tony West Avenue, about the vacant landmark's prospects. Those concerns were answered earlier this month when One Monument Avenue officially opened its doors: The hospital is now a privately owned, upscale apartment building with 34 good-sized units.

Fan landmark reborn

A $12 million renovation has transformed the former Stuart Circle Hospital into One Monument Avenue, luxury apartments in the city's Fan District. Units will rent from $1,500 to $2,500 a month. A model apartment (below) beckoned visitors, who also gathered in a courtyard (above) during a grand opening celebration yesterday. The units will be rented for five years to take advantage of tax credits, then will be sold as condominiums.
